Do you ever wonder why we yawn? A new study from Nottingham University in the UK has done research on this. Researchers found that yawning is contagious which means spreading or affecting others. It is impossible to stop this reaction. People automatically want to yawn when they see other people yawning. The researchers said people actually yawn more when they try to stop yawning. Even reading about yawning could be enough to make people yawn. You might even want to yawn right now. The researchers studied the reactions and brain activity of 36 adult volunteers. The volunteers looked at video clips of other people yawning. They had two choices: either to stop themselves yawning or to allow themselves to do it. The volunteers were videoed as they yawned or tried not to yawn. The researchers also monitored the brain activity of the volunteers and checked how strong their feelings to want to yawn were. Understanding more about yawning will help to treat some diseases.

Dear Manager,

You know that I work for your company as a guide. It's my job to make everything go well for the tourists. But something unpleasant happened last weekend. Last Saturday I met a group of tourists at the airport. I normally take our tourists to "The Sheraton Hotel", but this time it was hosting an international conference. So I took them to another hotel "The Navruz Hotel". I hadn't used the service of "The Navruz Hotel" before and didn't quite know what kind of service they had. When we arrived at the reception, they said the hotel was full and didn't have any free room. Although I had booked rooms beforehand, the manager said that somebody phoned a day before and said that we wouldn't need the rooms. The manager insisted it was I who made that phone call. I was very annoyed but the manager phoned other hotels and found rooms but in four different hotels. I don't know who made that phone call. I hope you will understand and won't blame me for what happened that day.

Sincerely, Salima Anvarovna.
